TOPICS TO BE COVERED/LEARNING OBJECTIVES

- Increasingly, health care providers and other stakeholders are looking to embrace population health strategies to create a community-wide “culture of health”.
- There is broad recognition that the poor health status of many Americans requires new strategies to address upstream drivers of health.
- Effectively managing populations of patients requires new partnerships among providers and payers and the traditional public health community.
- Participants will learn how to work across sectors to address these drivers, and build new bridges among health care, public health, and community development.
- Strategies pursued include new uses of data, analytics and information technology; augmenting a non-traditional health care workforce; and employing new delivery and payment models.
- Participants will learn how leading systems are drawing on these new tools and arrangements to improve the health not just of their own patients, but of overall communities.
- Nonprofit hospitals and health systems face new obligations under the Affordable Care Act to undertake community health needs assessments and implement community health improvement plans.
- Participants will learn how the most innovative systems are embracing and executing this new responsibility.
